Final Observation

Comparison of LLM Outputs

ChatGPT and Gemini extracted broadly similar information since the same prompt was used for both. However, differences in style were evident. ChatGPT used broader, interpretive language and organized content with thematic labels, making it more readable but occasionally less specific. Gemini was more data-forward — it named individual students, cited exact medal counts, and preserved the school's specific goal of reaching 'No. 1.' Gemini's output was more precise, though it contained one minor formatting artifact from LaTeX rendering (Class 10th) that required manual correction.

Usefulness of NotebookLM for Collation

NotebookLM effectively combined both LLM outputs into a unified, non-redundant summary. It removed duplication (both LLMs reported identical pass rates) while retaining unique details from each source. The collation elevated the tone from raw bullet points to a structured executive narrative, making the content more useful for actual stakeholders.
